

Your psychology is infrastructure. Most founders treat it as a luxury. The ones who last do not.

Built on cognitive psychology, affective science, and decision research, this book introduces the RESILIENT framework: nine trainable capacities that separate founders who merely survive from founders who stay clear under load. Your psychology, treated like a system: observed, trained, repaired, improved.

Inside, you will learn to:

- Map your stress signature and decode identity fusion before it costs you.
- Reappraise setbacks before they compound into catastrophes in your head.
- Name emotions precisely enough to choose the right response, not the loudest one.
- Protect attention as the currency every other skill spends.
- Architect decisions so the irreversible calls get the judgment they deserve.
- Build recovery as infrastructure, and organise support before isolation turns expensive.

This is not meditation rebranded for LinkedIn. It is operator-grade psychology: protocols you can run on a bad Tuesday when the runway is short, the inbox is loud, and the part of you that would remember to pause is already offline.

Operator-grade psychology for founders who refuse to confuse suffering with strategy.
